In order to save a passenger's life, an airline pilot decided to discharge jet fuel in the air during an emergency landing.

An elderly woman had felt unwell and complained of breathing difficulties while flying from Shanghai to New York. The woman was becoming unconscious and the situation was critical. The woman, who was travelling with her young daughter, was transferred from the economy class to business class, after airline crew had performed basic first aid on her. 5

When her condition did not improve, the crew then announced over the sound system for doctors to step forward to help the woman. But when nobody responded, the pilot made the decision to do an emergency landing at the nearest airport in Alaska. 10

Before he could do that, he had to dump a large amount of fuel to ensure that the plane could land safely. Fuel dumping is carried out in emergency situations, such as when an aircraft has to land before its intended destination, to reduce its weight. 15

The woman was taken to a local hospital after the emergency landing. She recovered soon after and was able to resume her trip to New York with her daughter the next morning.

"Four silver coins per trip," answered the boatman.

The man exclaimed that it was too costly. He told the boatman that he would only pay him two silver coins. The boatman did not say anything and began to row his boat. When they reached the middle of the river, he stopped and said, "You may get down here." 5

Upon hearing this, the man raised his voice at the boatman. "How do you expect me to get off here?" he asked furiously. 10

The boatman smiled and replied politely, "Sorry Sir, two silver coins will only take you here while four silver coins will take you across the river."

"Take me back to where we came from," commanded the man. He thought the boatman would think that it would be too troublesome to send him back so would just send him to his destination. 15

The boatman nodded. When they got back to where they had originally started, the boatman asked for four silver coins. The man then apologised, "I'm so sorry. I shouldn't have tried to take advantage of you. I will pay you for all the trips. Please send me across the river." He had learnt his lesson.
