Hot wind blew and fanned a wildfire that consumed homes, ranches and woodlands. At the edge of the forest, the fire got closer and closer to a nest of newborn cottontail rabbits. The shrub that sheltered them began to smoulder. Too young to flee, the helpless rabbits waited for their mother to return. Burning ash drifted into their nest and scorched their delicate ears.

A firefighter who was nearby heard a noise. He peered into the shrub and found the quivering nest of tiny rabbits, each one about the size of a small egg and too young to see or hear. There was no sign of the mother rabbit. The fire roared close to the place where the rabbits were. The firefighter scooped up the babies and gently placed them into his pockets.

Hours later, the six rabbits travelled in a shoebox to Wild Rescue, where wildlife rehabilitation expert Diana took them in. They smelled like a forest fire. The edges of their ears were ragged from the burns and they were suffering from smoke inhalation. Diana guessed they were about seven days old. She transferred the babies into a warm, humid incubator that would soothe their burnt skin.

"They can breathe but that's about it," said Diana who had rehabilitated thousands of cottontail rabbits. "They move slowly, which tells me they're in pain." She hoped that they would have the strength to survive. The rabbit with the worst burns did not.

SECTION I: COMPREHENSION (5 X 2m = 10 marks)

Read the passage carefully and answer the questions that follow.

Ibrahim tried several keys before he found the one that worked. Not knowing what they would find inside, they opened the door of the shed cautiously. The first thing that hit them was the awful stench. Toby and Joe almost vomited and Fara and Xinhui stayed away.

They were shocked at what they saw. Tiny cramped cages piled one on top of another. The rusty, bent bars could barely support the weight of the bears, which were in an awful state. Ibrahim could not see everything until his eyes became accustomed to the dim light. Fara had never seen or imagined anything as dreadful as this.

The bears had not seen any humans other than their torturers. They were frightened so Toby tried to calm them, "It's alright. We are here to rescue you." Ibrahim handed the smaller keys to his friends. Gradually, one by one, cage doors sprung open.

The bears were initially too shocked to move but slowly they stirred and stuck their noses out of the cages which had been their homes for many years. Their legs were weak and they found movement difficult. They flexed their muscles and several of them discovered that they had no muscles left.
