There lived a fisherman named Urashima. His father had been a fisherman and his skills were twice as good as his father's. Urashima was the most skilful fisherman in his village. He could catch more fish in a day than his comrades.

More than for being a clever fisherman, Urashima was known for his kindness. He had never hurt anything. As a boy, his companions laughed at him as he never joined them in teasing animals but always tried to keep them from this cruel sport.

One night, he saw some children beating a tortoise with a stick and hammering its shell with a stone. Urashima felt sorry and wanted to rescue it. He said, "Boys, you are treating that tortoise so badly. It will soon die." The boys ignored Urashima's gentle reproof.

10

Urashima decided to persuade them. He said, "I am sure you are good, kind boys! Please give me that tortoise. I will give you some money. You can do much more with it than with that poor tortoise." They were won over by his kind smile and gentle words. They handed the tortoise to him. Urashima kept his promise and gave them some money.

15

He walked to the shore and put the tortoise into the water. He felt happy that he had saved the tortoise from more danger.

(10 marks)

There was a farmer named Gopi who had three sons. Gopi was a very hardworking man. His hard work paid off and he was rewarded greatly. He grew plenty of corn to make a living. He also owned many other farms. Unfortunately, his sons were very lazy. They seldom helped their father on the farms. They did not mend their ways even when their father was seriously ill.

5

Gopi grew weak and could no longer work on the farm. The family went through some hard times during this period. The three brothers never realised that they should start working to help the family. Gopi was distraught when he saw this. He thought of a plan. On his deathbed, he called his sons and told them that he had buried a treasure in one of his farms. After disclosing this, he breathed his last.

After Gopi's death, his sons had mixed feelings. They were happy that their father had buried a treasure for them but they never got to know which farm the treasure was in.

After much thought, they decided to dig up one farm after another. Day and night, they dug deep in all of their father's farms but could not find the treasure. They were very disappointed. After all their digging, they saw that the farms looked very bare. So they thought of sowing seeds in the fields that they had dug. Bit by bit, Gopi's sons noticed that crops had begun to grow. They became encouraged when they saw this, so they toiled just like their father had. Eventually, their efforts bore fruit. During the season, they had plentiful harvest. Gopi's sons then realised that the reward of their hard work was the most valuable treasure in the world.
