Tech-entrepreneurs have changed the way we communicate, make purchases, order food and commute. They bridge the gap between businesses and consumers with innovative, out-of-the-box solutions. Steve Jobs' love of simplicity translated to revolutionary designs for the iPhone.

(16)

Tech-entrepreneurs are a driving force in global economies. Jack Ma, the founder of Alibaba, the biggest e-commerce company in the world, attributes its success to being based in Hangzhou, home to 72 billionaires of internet-based businesses.

(17)

Similarly, in Singapore, online marketplace, Carousell, raised US$35 million in 2018. A sizable pool of Singaporean tech-entrepreneurs based in the Silicon Valley in the United States is also thriving.

(18)

To foster a similar environment in Singapore to nurture young tech-entrepreneurs, the government is establishing initiatives to woo them home, including investing billions in research and innovation. If technology is shaping our future, then tech-entrepreneurs are the master craftsmen.

Be Smart and Start Saving

Have you started saving money? Some of your parents may have told you about the importance of saving for a rainy day. Most of you do not have to worry about emergencies yet. Nonetheless, getting into the habit of saving will prepare you to take care of yourselves and your families in future.

The cash gifts that you receive for birthdays or festive occasions present the best opportunities to start saving. You might be tempted to go on a shopping spree with all that extra money you suddenly have. To overcome that temptation, learn to distinguish needs from wants. Needs are things that you cannot do without, and wants are things that you would be happy to have but can do without.

Pushing through the crowd on the busy sidewalk of the street market, Jennie held on to her son's hand tightly. She had lost him once, and she vowed that she would not let it happen again. She looked around nervously at the endless stream of cyclists and tightened her grip on Kai's hand before sweeping him into her embrace, shielding him from yet another bicycle coming from the opposite direction. Kai clutched his favourite teddy bear and followed closely beside his mother.

Jennie bit her lower lip and exhaled heavily as she continued with her daily routine of stocking up food ingredients for her restaurant at the street market. What a chore it is to protect Kai from these people around me, thought Jennie as a frown creased her pale forehead. She shot glances of disdain at the street vendors and random cyclists.

The street vendor whom she had bought a bag of potatoes from had set up his makeshift stall at a quieter corner that day. It is the right spot, Jennie thought. She chuckled to herself at how lucky she was. There was nobody else there to foil her plan. She gripped the handles of the bag tightly and marched to the stall. A timeworn face greeted her with a slightly trembling voice. Kai's eyes were riveted on the man's ragged and threadbare shirt. Jennie swiftly pushed the man's hand away when he reached his hand out to pat Kai's head. "Why did you sell me these rotten potatoes? Take them back and give me fresh ones!" Jennie demanded.

The man gave Jennie a quizzical look. His elbow creaked softly as he calmly brought the bag of potatoes towards him. Raising his thick, white eyebrows he said, "These potatoes are definitely not from my stall. You may have bought them from someone else. I'm not the one"

The man asked Jennie to prove to him that the potatoes were indeed from his stall, refusing to give in to her request. Jennie cleared her throat worriedly and stammered, "Th... this... bag is from your stall." She picked up a fresh plastic bag from a small table at the stall and compared it with the one that she was carrying. Kai quietly took in the scene that lay before him as he lightly swung the arm of his teddy bear.

20

Tugging at the hem of his mother's blouse, Kai whispered, "Mum, weren't the potatoes from another stall down the street? Don't be so mean to the man." Jennie swivelled round. She quickly placed her palm over Kai's mouth and glared fiercely at him.

25

The man limped towards his crate of potatoes and examined them. He picked up a potato and compared it to those in Jennie's bag. He rested his palm against the deep wrinkles on his forehead and was deep in thought.

30

"What are you waiting for? My time is precious," Jennie growled as she narrowed her beady eyes.

Putting his fingers through the sides of the crate, the man carefully carried it towards Jennie. "Take whatever you want. This is all I have," the old man responded.

Jennie's lips curled into a smile. She emptied the bag of rotten potatoes and slowly filled it with fresh ones from the crate. Kai, who was standing quietly next to his mother, did not dare to look at the man in the eye. The man patted Kai's head and said, "I hope you will be able to stand up against what is wrong in the future."

35

Kai blushed and muttered, "I have already done that. Take my favourite teddy bear. It can keep you company at night." He pushed his toy into the man's arms before leaving with his mother.
