Linen is a natural fibre made from the stalk of a plant. It was the first fibre used to weave fabric and dates back over 8000 years. First used by Mediterranean civilisations, it was quickly adopted by Europe and it became popular during the medieval times. It was the most readily available fabric and remained the most popular even after the introduction of cotton fabrics by the Arabs during the 1300s.

Linen remained the fabric of choice until the eighteenth century when the introduction of spinning machines became much more affordable than the traditional linen techniques.

Presently, because of the laborious time it takes to produce linen, and the manual processes that have to be undertaken, linen has become a higher-priced commodity. It is considered, among many, to be a "luxury" fabric.

Let's Keep Myopia in Check!

2019

If you live in Singapore, you probably know what myopia is. Myopia, the medical name of short-sightedness, is commonly mentioned in schools as more than half the children here have the condition by the time they are 12 years old.

"Let's Keep Myopia in Check!" is a campaign that was first launched in 2014 to drive home an important message. The campaign organiser, Health Focus Singapore (HFS), wants young children and their parents to understand that having good eye care habits can bring myopia under control.

In the first few years, the campaign targeted primary school students. Eye care teams from HFS visited each school biannually to conduct eye checks and give assembly talks. The campaign received positive responses and support from various sources increased. By 2017, the number of eye care teams had tripled. That allowed HFS to start sending teams to pre-schools as well. This year, HFS plans to celebrate the campaign's fifth anniversary by engaging the general public in a wide range of activities that promote good eye care.

Sora observed in amazement as Weilun picked up two large metal cans and carried them out the door. She trailed behind Weilun with a pail of clothes, watching him carry the two cans effortlessly. They were large and were covering Weilun's small frame. "This way," he said. "We must go to the river to wash these clothes and fill the cans with water."

Sora's father had sent her to the village to learn about rural life. Having grown up in a privileged environment, Sora had never once done any household chores back home. The rural was too dull for her to bear and she could not wait to return home. Her resistance to learning new things only further dampened her mood. Sora's friends even quipped that she would not be able to survive in the village. She did not understand why her father would always chant "Where is your willingness to learn?" whenever she asked him if she could stay home for the holidays. Her father had given her a checklist on the life skills that she needed to pick up before she returned home, one of which was to wash clothes. She recalled washing a table cloth after an art lesson in school. That was easy, she thought. She was confident that she would be able learn all of them without any help.

"Where are your clothes? I will help you wash them," Sora gestured Weilun to the rocks by the river.

"You don't look like you know how to do it," Weilun said as he shot Sora an incredulous glance.

"Why not?" Sora huffed, irritated by his lack of confidence in her. She swiftly picked up the clothes and started to scrub them against the rocks. Sora giggled inwardly as she imagined how proud her father would be of her to know that she could wash clothes without any supervision. "Why would I need a young boy to teach me how to do such a simple chore?" muttered Sora as she put on her earphones to drown out Weilun's voice.

"Remember to rinse the detergent in the pail, not in the river," Weilun reminded Sora. Sora continued with her task, not knowing what exactly Weilun had said.

Wringing out the last piece of clothing, Sora carefully placed it back in the pail. Suddenly, a bird descended from the sky. Sora released her grip of the pail in shock as she dodged the incoming bird thinking that it wanted to attack her. She heaved a sigh of relief when she realised that the bird was aiming for a worm that was inches away from her. Sora diverted her gaze back to the pail of clothes. "Oh no!" she yelled in horror. "They have drifted off in the river!" She paced up and down the river bank, not knowing what to do. Weilun, who was filling the large cans with water at the far end of the river, stood up and ran towards Sora.

"What happened to the clothes?" Weilun asked puzzledly. Sora quickly shifted the blame to the bird. He pointed at the detergent foam that gathered on the surface of the river. "Don't tell me you rinsed the detergent from the clothes in the river? Don't you know that it may kill the river creatures? You were the one who caused the problem, not the bird!" Sora looked down in shame. "You think that you know everything, but you actually don't. I wanted to teach you, but you refused. You won't understand," Weilun sighed. He proceeded to retrieve the pail of clothes that had rolled towards a tree.

Sora closed her eyes to let Weilun's words sink in for a moment. She finally understood the meaning behind her father's chants and realised that both Weilun and her father had taught her the same lesson. She walked towards Weilun and whispered, "Could you teach me all the life skills that my father had planned for me to learn?"
